A government edict

Thanks to Senate Bill 7, after Feb. 6, private businesses in Texas will be prohibited from requiring employees to get the COVID vaccine. A clear case of the state mandating restrictions on managerial prerogatives and free enterprise.

But then, we would expect this hindrance from the Socialist Republic of Austin.

What might be next from the interfering legislature? Perhaps employers may not:

- Insist employees wear ear protection in a sawmill.

- Ban smoking while pumping gas.

- Require gloves while giving blood transfusions.

- Demand welders wear eye shield masks.

When will it end? Only when government gets out of the way.

But for now, the big foot of increased regulation is in the door.
